And again, the Lads of Boytown also showed up to the streets in Cali this week for a viewing of the movie showing. You are watching a fully operational Mormon Temple. My best guess is that it holds 2,000 children. It would have to be the biggest preschool in the world to make something like this work. We haven't seen such a thing in Denver in years. Located in the foothills of the Rocky Mountains, the kids who attend are taught by Mormon high priests and they all perform the temple rituals together. Something that kids probably see on TV while distracted by the glossy superheroes, go-karts and fast food on TV. It's hard to tell how they interact with adult "Morms", but I would imagine that they can come and go as they like. This would be one of the biggest freaky-looking temples I have ever seen. The local police had to get the FBI to stand guard when visitors came. The visit is an annual thing that occurs for about 2 months every year. In the group are five boys and two girls. The kids are just about as tall as their mom's and dad's heads, although it's not quite the same thing as the smaller kids. As I sit here, I can't help but wonder if the group is part of some experiment or community outreach effort. That's when I noticed that I was observing the temple from a front lawn in an empty neighborhood. All I could hear was children laughing and playing and yelling, from the grass that was now up to about 20 feet high. Although it's not quite the same as seeing it inside, it was quite a view for this reporter. I'm not sure if the neighbors know what's going on, but I doubt that they'll complain. This year, the kids stayed inside for the height of tourist season, so it was pretty much empty. They can even handle a little snow, which they have to shovel out of the driveway. The kids look like they are all about 10-years-old. I know that it's been nearly a year since the building closed, but I figure if it's made it this long, it must be safe. Still, I have to wonder what they teach them inside. I can't imagine that they sit and think about the future or God. Most of them are enjoying the kids activities they are all being shown, such as riding go-karts.
